TEACHING AND GRADUATE SUPERVISION

Teaching Philosophy and Interests

I ascribe to a scholar/researcher-practitioner model, in which a professor has one foot in scholarship/research and another foot in professional practice. I also deeply believe in an interdisciplinary framework, which posits that thinkers should spend a good amount of time engaged in professional fields outside of the discipline they were trained in order to design creative endeavors and become a critical thinker.

The acronym RICE best describes my teaching philosophy: Respect, Information, Critical Thinking, and Enthusiasm. Respect for the students, his or her cultural background, and ideas are a paramount element in developing a multicultural learning environment; without it, learning becomes hegemonic. This includes being aware of my own social and cultural identities and purposefully not privileging them and allowing students to share their cultural perspective related to the subject matter. It also means being flexible in learning, changing classroom assignments at the group or individual level, and having student teach me as we explore a subject matter together. I have found that a multicultural learning environment can be developed by taking a case studies, problem-based learning, or project-based learning approach to learning. Although there is a place where teachers must provide technical information students need, learning and professional practice must also include critical thinking skills required in order to analyze issues, solve problems, and communicate and defend findings. Finally, enthusiasm for the subject matter and the students is a must. Students are very much aware of an instructor's attitude regarding the course and the individuals he/she is teaching.

My research and teaching interests include: (1) leisure and mental health, including leisure and wellness embedded in mental health counseling and leisure services at Mayo Clinic, (2) cross-cultural therapeutic recreation/inclusive recreation and leisure service delivery, (3) leisure education intervention, (4) historical and philosophical foundations of leisure and nonprofit human services, including Hull-House 1889-1953 and the Settlement House movement, and (5) the nexus between moral development and songs/short stories of musician Bruce Springsteen.
